NYC Department For The Aging:

Verna Arthur, Director of Community Outreach

- DFTA tries to meet the needs of many of the 1.3 million older New Yorkers who are in need of services now and in the future, by contracting with more than 400 local agencies, to provide a wide array of services throughout the five boroughs. These services are designed to reflect the rich cultural and diversity of New York City's local neighborhoods.
- The good news is that DFTA was spared from cuts in this year's budget.
- NYC's 65 and plus population will double over the next 20 years, as baby boomers age and people living longer.
- Aging research is showing us that, what was once seen as an inevitable decline in older people is no longer valid. Now we see the process of aging as a result to the positive influence of healthy lifestyles, good nutrition, rich social networks, intellectual and creative stimulation and opportunities for ongoing involvement.
- One of Mayor Bloomberg's 59 Age-friendly NYC Initiatives is the Innovative Senior Centers (ISCs).
- One of the most far-reaching of the Age-friendly Initiatives is the Department's revamping of its senior center network to better help seniors thrive.
- Of the eight ISCs that were launched, Manhattan has 2: Lenox Hill, and Young Men and Young Women Hebrew Associations; as well as 2 citywide ISCs – VISION and SAGE.
- The rest of the City's network of 250 or so senior centers will be linked to these centers in various ways.
- Moreover, DFTA expects these innovative centers to develop practices and approaches that other centers can adopt as they too do things like:
 - Developing healthy menus, meal options and health-enhancing activities.
 - Adding exciting new programs.
 - Strengthening their community linkages and their capacity to address issues like poverty by providing assistance with benefits and entitlements.
- Urged senior to speak to their senior center directors to implement healthy and innovative program in their centers if they have not already done so.
- Wilson Major Morris Senior Center is no longer one of DFTA's Programs; it is funded by discretionary funds.
- Distributed information pamphlets re: Food Stamp Programs (SNAP).
